From the beginning of the revolution, condencies have been toward military rule, or abroad. supremacy of power meraly military. While this has resulted, in some degree, from the neconsities of the condition, it has resulted quite as much, it would soom, from design, suggestive of premeditation. When the war began, the people, with a unanimity of enthusiasm rarely witnessed, under the influence of the bonest thought that it was a war for their dearest rights and interests, invaded by an unlawful. central despotism controlled by an unscrupulous popular majority behind, rushed forward. and placed themselves, their sons, their fortunes, their all, at the disposal of the Government. Under this serious, honest thought, they have not only submitted quietly to all the evils and hardships of the time, to pressing wants, privations and sorrows, not only submitted in a spirit of sacred esprit de carps, without murmur, or complaint, to military and political mismanagement involving frequently their all, but to ments as wells believing that they were the Gen. This paleful persuation is becoming equally the painful persuasion of the popular heart and mind. When the people see the andless ramifiestions of military police, extending to the management of their most delicate interests, and the invasion of their most delicate rights, and which, so far from meeting restriction or rebuke from the President, are the motives for demanding still day. greater exections and insisting upon still greater invarious, and observe that, while the Prosident and his officers have all the power, that they have all the burden, they maturally ask whither are things new tending, and whither have they tended ' They ask whether Yankee subjugation is to be made the perpetual pretext for their own !
